

Hi Shahar,

I misjudged you I guess. Actions speak louder than words, as it is often said, and what I know for sure is that our character and the truth of who we are is not based simply on what we say but on that which we do. The actions we take or don't take, the commitments we keep, and those that we don't. The integrity of our word demonstrated by subsequent action is what defines us as people.

I am pretty reasonable. I know things happen. Saying you'd make a conscious effort to get clients to make your way down to me on Sunday but if things didn't work out for any reason you could guarantee a visit on Monday ... words. Words I was excited to hear and hoped you would fulfill. You not keeping that commitment and subsequently not contacting me to let me know you couldn't make it ... actions. Not responding to my texts to offer any sort of explanation or apology ... actions. And the sum of our actions is what defines and conveys to people who we are and what we are about.

There is a quote that I love and try to be mindful of whenever I meet and get to know anyone "People will show you who they are, believe them. Believe them the first time" Dr. Maya Angelo. I'm not saying you're wrong or that what you did or didn't do was bad. We just seem to be on different pages with how we chose to engage with other people I want to engage with people from a place of trust and mutual respect.

You may have a legitimate reason for what happened but try as I might, I'm not a mind reader, and I can only base things on what's presented to me. At first, I was angry but then I quickly realized that what I was feeling was hurt. So, why was I hurt? I care about people and I care about you. I was genuinely excited to see you again. Maybe you're not aware that people might care about you so maybe it doesn't occur to you that people might be hurt when you don't reply or don't show up. I can only guess because I've not talked to you so I don't know.

My intention is not to bag on you but rather to convey to you that I truly liked you, I think you're hot of course, and I wanted to get to know you better and how you treated me hurt. I guess whether or not your care remains to be seen.

Sincerely

Michael